Operations handover

Handover purpose

The operations team is preparing a handover for the next internal service exercise. Two matters remain open: selecting an on-call rotation and reviewing the proposed recovery drill. The note includes one explicit deadline and deliberately leaves the other subject undated. Participants should preserve that distinction when recording decisions. The document also refers to a completed drill from October as historical evidence, not as another exercise that must be scheduled.

Discussion items

- Decide the on-call rotation before 12 November 2026.

- Review the recovery drill; no date has been assigned.

On-call rotation background

Decide the on-call rotation before 12 November 2026. The proposed coverage period spans the shared staging demonstrations, and the team has not selected the sequence of available operators. The decision should consider the published availability and whether each operator can access the current handover notes. The meeting should settle the rotation or state what prevents agreement. The date in this paragraph belongs to the rotation decision; it should not be copied into every other topic simply because the subjects appear in one document.

Recovery drill background

Review the recovery drill; no date has been assigned. The proposed drill describes a synthetic failure, restoring the previous staging build and checking whether the workspace opens with the prepared test account. Operations wants to review the scenario and success criteria before selecting when to run it. The meeting is not asked to perform the drill itself. Comments about preparation, recovery steps and the final check all support reviewing this same drill rather than becoming a set of separate agenda topics.

Historical drill

The old drill on 1 October 2026 is already completed. Its record confirms that the team followed the previous checklist and restored a known staging build. The report was accepted and placed in the archive. It is included as a reference for comparing the proposed drill, not as an unfinished action. There is no request to rerun the October exercise or to reopen its accepted outcome. The historical date must not be mistaken for the date of the proposed drill.

Supporting material

The operations representative has already distributed the availability sheet, the accepted October record and the proposed drill description. Access to those files was checked before the invitation was sent. This preparation is Completed. The participant list and file distribution are logistical details rather than outstanding topics. During the review, observations should be tied to the relevant rotation or drill so that a reader can tell which conclusion a remark supports.

Expected decision record

The notes should identify the chosen on-call rotation and retain the explicit deadline associated with that decision. They should separately state whether the proposed recovery drill is acceptable or needs revision. The absence of a drill date is genuine missing information, not permission to invent one. A deferred review should stay visibly open until the team records a supported conclusion.
